Cards I see this question a lot in job interviews and it's an easy question to answer: what are the three things you would need to do to offer great credit cards to clients? Here's the answer: 1. Put an offer in front of them. 2. Present it properly. 3. Make a great impression. The way I explain this is to say that you want to be patient and let them come to you. But you also need to be prepared and offer a great card to be successful. What does that mean? 1. Put an offer in front of them. If you are a card-issuing bank and you don't want the consumer to pay you for the privilege of using your card, then you need to be offering to the consumer a product that is far better than any competitors. If a credit card is a necessity to buy groceries, then consider that you are competing with cash. If a credit card is a necessity to travel, you might want to consider that you are competing with cash as well. If, on the other hand, a credit card is a luxury — or a product that is not as necessary as cash — you need to compete with your peers that are offering such credit cards. In fact, according to a fascinating study, what we think about and how we feel about ourselves is not as important as what others think about us. For example, is it a good idea to just give everyone in the world a free meal?
