Ahoy. I’m Mr. Dadish, the Totally Awesome Dad from the Like Totally Awesome Dad series. I brought my kids, Nick and Kale, to work today so we could all bond. Then the evil with-no-name-in-particular thief stole my kids away while I was on the clock with them. Looks like we’re all gonna have to do our time together and maybe even find a way to make up for it. Let’s face it: being a dad is a hell of a lot of work, and that’s why I’m here to find my kids. But let’s get serious for a minute: they won’t be back until we take on the biggest challenge of our whole career together. So I guess it’s time to put the bags under my eyes on ‘throwaway.’ You ready? About You: You just want to help out. You’re about to get to be a dad, too, so it’s totally normal to want to be a part of this. You know that letting kids play and learn at an early age is super important, so maybe you’d like to help out in any way you can. Just remember: these are kids we’re talking about here. 90 / 10084.6 Gather ‘n’ Glow is a game about lights, shapes, and your own imagination. screen. To place a shape, press the buttons on the right side of the screen. To direct the light to point in the desired direction, use the arrow keys. Upon starting the game, you'll have four types of lights. Each has a color, a shape, and a sound. Use them to earn points! One thing that sets Gather 'n' Glow apart from many similar games is that the shapes you use are not confined to triangles or rectangles. You can use any shape that you like. The only limitation is that the shapes you create must be placed on a level surface (floors, tables, etc.). If you're feeling brave, you can play around with shapes and lights that are pre-programmed into the game by the developers. The game also features a memory system, where your previous score c9d1549cdd

What's new:

The Internet's a-buzz about a new motion-capture Web game titled Astromonkey's Revenge. The release date is October 13 -- Halloween -- and the three-story-high, fully playable computer-generated graphics game is already getting lots of media attention. But it's not so unusual. Every time a major motion-capture game comes out, developers are suddenly inundated with requests for help and consulting. Games like Astromonkey's Revenge have cropped up out of nowhere. The changes are nothing short of astonishing. Consider that according to Nintendo alone, the company takes in more than $30 billion a year, and a full 10 percent of that comes from its Nintendo DS and Wii platforms, yet next to these, though hugely popular, the concept of motion capture is still in the startup phase. "A lot of developers are still trying to figure out what it can do. They're concerned if they're going to be able to make the leap from what they've done in the past and what motion capture and graphics can do together." says Douglas Russel, executive vice president and general manager of E-Line Media, a Bumper's Entertainment-owned firm in Culver City, Calif., that's worked with the game already. For developers, there are technical issues as well as business ones. You can guess that developing any new product that you can't quite put a price on is difficult; doing so for a "silly" game without a target market is especially so. But money for marketing should not get in the way of good physics-driven gameplay. Nowadays, many publishers would rather stick to the more tried-and-true medium of 2D animation. Why? There's a lot of work to be done -- work that once a publisher might have gotten around on its own. "After you do a serious 2D game, you have a nice production pipeline of characters, animation, environments. It's quite a lot of work, but it's tried and true and you've done it. Now motion capture has the most remarkable amount of directions to go to," says David Lau, vice president of Interactive Entertainment Software Association, a Washington-based trade group, and publisher and developer of more than 40 titles. Motion capture is no longer new. In 1999, LucasFilm put "Star Wars Episode II: Attack of the Clones" together with motion-capture software from MGI (Motion Analysis, Inc.), Mook, and others, and
